The ground that we walk on is full of surprises, if you know where to look.

The Making of the American Landscape Example

So, we have five steps in these falls, and you can think of each of those steps, each of these layers, as another volcanic eruption. KIRK JOHNSON: I think so. KIRK JOHNSON: It sure is.

William Cronon

Designed to complement existing courses on American environmental history and the history of the American West, it begins by orienting students to the geography of the North American continent, paying special attention to those features—geology, physiography, climate, vegetation, ecology—that have had the greatest influence on human lives in different regions. Look at that seam down there. KIRK JOHNSON: Silt is next, made of the same stuff as sand but ground much finer.
