Louis, in 1250, laid the foundation of a college, which obtained, from the name of its founder, the title of College of the Sorbonne, and which was the first instituted for secular students of theology, as would appear from an expression contained in a decree of Louis, its great benefactor, which designates it as an establishment ad opus congruati Kmu pauperum magistrorum Parisiis in Hieologia Hudenium. Our fruitful and smiling provinces of the south, which, during the darkness of the middle ages, preserved for a long time and rekindled first among us those sparks of sacred fire, are now most backward in knowledge. The young king, Charles XII.

The length of time the Work has been passing through the press, has been rendered necessary by the many references that had to be made of a corroboratory nature, and the time required in examining into and tracing to their results, as at present existing, many of the circumstances related. Amongst these Pliny the Elder.
