The United States Army in Somalia, 1992

The Army's humanitarian relief efforts have generally been less complicated and more successful.

Alumni US

It took time to fill the UN positions for the new force and, by all accounts, the handover of the mission was poorly done with only 30 percent of the UN staff in place on the date of transfer. After a tough, dismounted firefight near the K-4 traffic circle, the QRF commander, Lt.

Army soldiers behaved with care and restraint. As dawn broke, all the casualties from the first site were loaded onto the armored personnel carriers; the remainder of the force moved rapidly on foot south along Shalalawi Street to National Street in what became known as the Mogadishu Mile. During the course of RESTORE HOPE, some 38,000 soldiers from 23 different nations and representatives from 49 different humanitarian relief operations worked together to put food into the mouths of the starving people of Somalia.

Operations management research: an update for the 1990s

The Army began by assisting in relief operations in Somalia, but by December 1992 it was deeply engaged on the ground in Operation RESTORE HOPE in that chaotic African country. The already complex mission and difficult environment took a dramatic turn with those events. DeLong, Kent and Tuckey, Steven.
