Celtic Chalk Hill Figures, including Horses and Giants

Cutting of horses is common, as well as more abstract symbols and, in the modern era, advertising brands.

Mystery Of Prehistoric Gigantic Hill Figures Of England

The reasons for the creation of these figures are varied and rather obscure, but both hill figures and white horses are among the most attention-grabbing features of the chalk landscape in southern England. The Uffington White Horse - surrounded by Neolithic and Bronze Age burial mounds - has been placed in such a way that it can only really be viewed well from afar or from above.

Other samples, however, gave later dates ranging up to 1560; one possible explanation is that the Giant may have first been cut in the late Saxon period, but then abandoned for several centuries. On Chalking days the volunteers arrive at the hill with hammers, grab a bucket of chalk and smash the chalk into a paste which is then used on the paths and outlines of the horse.
