However, the local townspeople are displeased and a row brews between them and the Abbey, when they ask for a proportion of the fair tolls to be given to the town to restore the walls after recent outbreaks of war - seen in earlier books, when the town was besieged. The next night they tried Euan's booth, killing him when he defended himself.

We have dispatched from our book depository; items of good condition to over ten million satisfied customers worldwide. It was interesting to learn how the Abbey profited from running the fair; why the Abbot was so intent on protecting the Abbey's rights and why the town leaders were so disappointed in his answer.
