While the emperor lay at Antioch in his Persian expedition, the particulars of which we shall hereafter relate, the punishment of some soldiers who had discovered in the baths of women, excited a sedition in the legion to which they belonged.

Alexander ascended his tribunal, and with a modest firmness represented to the armed multitude the absolute necessity, as well as his inflexible resolution of correcting the vices introduced by his impure predecessor, and maintaining the discipline, which could not be relaxed without the ruin of the Roman name and empire.

His clamours interrupted his mild expostulations. "Reserve your shouts," said the undaunted emperor, "till you take the field against the Persians, the Germans and the Sarmatians. Be silent in the presence of your sovereign and benefactor, who bestows upon you the care, the clothing and the money of the provinces. Be silent, or I shall no longer style you soldiers, but citizens, if these indeed who disdain the laws of Rome deserve to be ranked among the meanest of its people!"

His sentences inflamed the fury of the legion and their brutalised ears slowly threatened his person. "Your courage," resumed the intrepid Alexander, "would be more nobly displayed in the field of battle; me you may destroy, but cannot intimidate; and the severe justice of the republic would punish your crime and revenge my death!"

The legion still persisted in the clamorous sedition, when the emperor pronounced, with a loud voice, the decisive sentence, "Citizens! Lay down your arms and depart in peace to your respective habitations!"

The trumpet was instantly sounded; the soldiers, filled with grief and shame, silently confessed the justice of their punishment and the power of discipline, yielded up their arms and military ensigns, and retired in confusion out to their camp but to the several parts of the city.

Alexander enjoyed, during thirty days, the edifying spectacle of their repentance; nor did he remove them to their former rank in the army, till he had punished with death those whose countenance had occasioned the mutiny. The grateful legion served emperor, while living, and revenged him when dead.
