In the mid-19th century as much as 60—80 percent of the total grain harvest on certain pomeshchik farms went to the market, bringing about a decline in the peasant economy and the ruin of the peasantry, which in turn undermined the corvée economy of the pomeshchiki. Under the Sudebnik of 1497, throughout the state peasants could change owners during a single period, usually the week before and after St. Turkmenia fell under the sway of the Khwarazm-Shahs in the late 12th and early 13th centuries.
