Music of discipline and reform - the hands of children's orphanages, industrial schools and asylums

Chris Holmes - July 2019

From the early 17th century through to WWII, at least, large numbers of institutions were established to provide for various segments of society which did not fit into "normal" life. These included orphanages, the sick, criminals, the destitute, paupers, and those that others, we would refer to as physically and mentally handicapped.

Through various local and national initiatives and laws the workhouses, poor law unions, asylums and prisons were established to house and, hopefully, reform or rehabilitate their inmates.

Workhouses, prisons, lunatic asylums, orphanages, and "industrial schools" were just some of these institutions. Some were operated by the state, others by local organizations established by or sponsored by the state in some cases. Charitable, philanthropic and religious organizations also set up homes for orphaned and the poor. They were variously funded by local taxes, parent organizations (e.g. the Church), rich patrons, grants and their own local raising.

Some elements of treatment and/or education were undertaken to prepare the inmates for their eventual release either back into society or, in the case of children, to make their own way in the adult world.

Reform and other hands were often set up to help educate the children (usually boys) it had to be said, to provide another aspect of discipline, recreation and time, presumably, to give them a chance to grow into the adult world. A small number of children were sent to a limited career even from the school. A small number of children were sent to a limited career even from the school. Similarly, hands were established in some of the adult institutions, to help with discipline, provide entertainment and also some hands for the institutions. Handicrafts were sold to raise money for the institutions. These duties could include teaching appropriate subjects for the children in "work", hand raising, maintenance of the buildings and more. On occasion the institutions engaged an external musical team, instead of a full time in-house band, usually one with a connection to other bands in the locality.

Details of various institutional hands are given below.
