Burntisland also has a dormant volcano called the Binn which is worth the hike for these views below across the Firth of Forth, one of the free things to do in Fife. The Picts are believed to be descendents of the Celtic Caledonii tribe and other Celtic tribes mentioned by the Roman historians or on the world map of Ptolemy. GENUKI: Fife, Fife

Picti seems to be a generic term for people living north of the Forth-Clyde isthmus. The southern coast is, for the most part, indented by small rocky bays with corresponding projecting headlands; but along the banks of the Tay, the grounds slope gently toward the beach, and are generally cultivated to the river's edge. You will find other places not in Fife listed in the GENUKI Gazetteer which covers the whole of England, Wales and Scotland and can be searched by place-name or part of a place-name or Ordnance Survey Grid References six-figure, eg NO360130.

The site is searchable by parish or by place and gives map references. I will then amend it on this page, once again thanks again to everyone. We have only heard these names from second or third hand from speakers of the Brythonic or Gaelish language as Pictish written recorded history did not begin until the Dark Ages.
