Pacific Region Environmental Strategy 2005

This section of eleven entries focuses on such archaeological matters as excavations, megalithic culture, cultural artefacts, rock carvings and paintings, and such activities as cannibalism that can be studied using archaeological techniques. Geographically, Fiji consists of mountainous volcanic islands rising sharply from the sea, surrounded by coral reefs and covered, on the windward side, with thick tropical vegetation. From their study of this and four other cases Hempenstall and Rutherford conclude that colonial rulers in the Pacific islands failed to respond appropriately to initiatives for change arising from the indigenous people.
