A dump truck and a cement mixer completed the original three-model release that marked the starting point for the mass-market success of the Matchbox series. The brand grew to encompass a broad range of toys, including larger scale die-cast models, plastic model kits, and action figures. Often, the changes are very minor, even minute, and may occur in places that are not clearly visible at first glance.

Yet they were still just as complex and time consuming to construct as any other kit, which limited their appeal to more casual model builders. Lesney co-owner Jack Odell then created a toy that paved the way for the company's future success which was designed for his daughter. And as it is likely that the sports car's initial popularity remains unbroken, its value is now also driven upward by this fact as well.

They ceased developing most of such lines when Matchbox was absorbed into Tyco; some of the Robotech toys were later re-released by under the line. Unsourced material may be challenged and. Some sets included model variations officially released only in the sets generally, these were variant colours , while others contained additional, non-die-cast items not available without the set.

Small huts, on each side of the main straight track section, contained the individual motors which powered each lane, allowing the vehicles in adjacent lanes vehicles to be raced, although all vehicles in the same lane would travel at the same speed. Mattel eventually bought the company and continues to release cars under the Matchbox brand. Most often, these models were Yesteryears, though the 1-75 series was also used for this purpose.

Matchbox Collectibles

Since the regular series was primarily aimed at the UK and the US, models for the Commonwealth and North America could easily be integrated into it. This enabled them to make models with surprisingly high levels of detail, despite the small scale.

The figures were popular for their high-quality molding and their different extra weapons and poses as compared to the more common Airfix sets. There were also jigsaw puzzles of photographs depicting Matchbox vehicles in realistic-looking situations, race track sets Superfast track was yellow, as opposed to Hot Wheels' orange, and of a slightly wider gauge , a particularly clever plastic snap-together wall-display system, roadways, and even a slot-car system for standard non-powered car models, the Matchbox Motorways. Major Packs, which were larger-scale models, often of construction vehicles, were added in 1957.
