Jeroen D Stout, Arnold Bennett's 'Literary Taste: How to Form it'

A whole poem composed of lines with no better recommendation than that line has would remain merely curious or pretty. Honesty, in literature as in life, is the quality that counts first and counts last. The beauty of old houses and gardens and aged virtuous characters, the beauty of children, the beauty of companionships, the softening beauty of dreams in an arm-chair—all these are brought together and mingled with the grief and regret which were the origin of the mood.

You are not of those who read because the clock has just struck nine and one can't go to bed till eleven. I am convinced, further, that not one man in ten who goes so far as knowingly to buy poetry ever reads it. You cannot like Lamb without liking literature in general.

Why a Classic Is a Classic

Think you have a brilliant idea but only lack the words to express it? And life would be correspondingly degraded, because the fallacious idea and the petty emotion would never feel the upward pull of the ideas and emotions of genius. You are certainly not going to realise your ambition—and so great, so influential an ambition! The most rash will not dare to affront it.

Literary Taste

Indeed, it is important, if you wish ultimately to have a wide, catholic taste, to guard against the too common assumption that nothing modern will stand comparison with the classics. No harshnesses or eccentricities now! You were under a divine impulse to impart that discovery. When you have made for yourself such a picture, read the Essays of Elia the light of it.
