Regionalism in Central Asia

In the case of whether the states have the capacity to follow through on their agreements, it must be conceded that it is a possibility, but this does not explain the ongoing creation and rhetoric surrounding the creation of regional organizations. So seeing as the literature assumes an independent legislature and executive accountable to voters and the presence of interest groups, sectors and classes, which are distinctly lacking in post-Soviet states, she argues that the regular explanations put forward fall short Collins 2009, p. Constructivists reject the static material basis of the establishment of regions given by the rationalists.

Regionalism in Central Asia

In the process of nation building, one of the most important things to work on is economic success, and, as we saw earlier, there are many economic gains to be garnered from the process of regionalization.

Regionalism in South Asia: An Idle Notion

The unpredictability of the regimes in the area and their tendency to do what is best for them in the short-term is a massive liability. The majority of the discussions in the Third World were influenced by the structural traditions of economic development advocated by Gunnar Myrdal. I will just briefly mention two of the most difficult of these issues that require our attention: historical disputes, and military balance of power issues.
