Two Letters to the Right Honorable Lord Byron by William Lisle Bowles

Do you think he will do anything for George, or be at any expense to give him a proper education; or, if he wish to do it, is his present fortune such a one that he could spare anything out of it? Written, as Byron wrote, with habitual exaggeration, and on the impulse of the moment, his letters correct one another, and, from this point of view, every letter contained in the volume adds something to the truth and completeness of the portrait.

James Hogg: To the Right Hon. Lord Byron.

She is as I have before declared certainly mad to say she was in her senses, would be condemning her as a Criminal, her conduct is a happy compound of derangement and Folly. At the age of thirty-five she was a stout, dumpy, coarse-looking woman, awkward in her movements, provincial in her accent and manner. I cannot exactly say when I return to Harrow, but however it will be in a very short time.

A Letter to the Right Hon. Lord Byron : Protesting Against the Immolation of Gray, Cowper, & Campbell, at the Shrine of Pope

James Millingen, who inspected the feet after the poet's death, says that there was a malformation of the left foot and leg, and that he was born club-footed. Their loss cannot be replaced; but their best substitute is found in his letters.

Her letters on the subject are sensible, not ill-expressed, and, considering the circumstances in which they were written, give a favourable impression of her character.
