10 Human Rights Issues Of The Future

The EU in 2030: a long-term view of Europe in a changing world: keeping the values, changing the attitudes. States will most likely use increasingly sophisticated ICT to monitor their populations and control and censor information as is already apparent.

The Future of Human Rights Blog

Further, education equips individuals to be much greater masters of their own fate—better able to engage in political life and better able to find shelter, food and employment security. Within migrant populations, women, children and visible minorities will be most at risk.

Towards 2026

Barbuda's fate, for better or for worse, will be evenly distributed across the world before too long.

Global Trends and the Future of Human Rights Advocacy

Technology also changes our relationship with powerful institutions. We are habituated with one- to three-year planning and funding cycles, often failing to anticipate fundamental changes that require preparations now, but that will take place within ten to twenty years.
