What's Next after the US Inauguration? Trends and Predictions in American Foreign Policy

It has acted as though economics is the province of somebody else and they should be the ones dealing with it. The world has endured previous pandemics, shifting alliances, revisionist powers, irredentist states; empires have risen and fallen; invincible nations have been vanquished.

Transcript: Dialogues on American Foreign Policy and World Affairs: Discussing the Future of U.S. Foreign Policy and National Security with Jake Sullivan

Defense Policy Under an America Engaged scenario, a Biden administration would support a strong US defense and seek to avoid any significant cuts in defense spending. So, what Jen Harris and I were basically arguing is that the foreign policy community, the national security community, has for too long set aside economics. And what Jennifer Harris and I are arguing is not to pull up the drawbridge or end global trade, or return to a deeply protectionist approach, but rather to pursue an international economic policy that involves substantial flows of trade.

2020 election scenarios: Implications for American foreign policy

Instead of devoting endless hours and countless billions of dollars trying to determine the local politics of distant lands that the United States does not understand—even after nearly two decades of trying—Americans should focus more of their political energies on making their political institutions more representative, less skewed in favor of wealthy interests, and more capable of decisive action. But this time really is different.

What's Next after the US Inauguration? Trends and Predictions in American Foreign Policy

There may be plenty of recurring behaviors in world politics—nations rise and fall, balances form, wars are fought and won, etc.

The United States Will Be Shocked by Its Future

First, a lot can change in a heck of a hurry. He has launched trade wars that have accomplished little beyond hurting the U.
