Language Change

In extreme cases, such as the plantations of the New World, where huge numbers of West African slaves were transplanted during the era of European colonization, contact led to the emergence of creole languages, so called because they were used by the 'creole' or locally born slaves as well as many Europeans in the colonies. Pidgins have also arisen in contexts other than trade, for instance in cases of military occupation Pidgin English in Japan or in domestic settings for communication between masters and servants of different language background Indian Butler English or on plantations Hawaiian Pidgin English. Pidgins and creoles: An introduction.
