The Gifford Lectures

The first Giffords began in 1889 with three series of lectures by, respectively, the Hegelian philosopher James Stirling, the philologist Friedrich Muller, and the Scots-born literary figure Andrew Lang. Religiously inclined philosophers presented two broad reactions to these developments.

In recognition of their historic and continuing contribution the Templeton Foundation also created an online archive to carry texts, biographies and other information; and the US author Larry Witham has written a Templeton commissioned history of the Giffords entitled The Measure of God: Our Century-Long Struggle to Reconcile Science and Religion London: Harper Collins, 2005. They could converge with the growing interest among reflective scientists in the possibility that biology and cosmology exhibit evidences of design. The observable adaptations of the organ of sight to the rays of light and their various affections - the nature of vision and its extensive usefulness contemplated; Lecture the twelfth, and the third on optics.

Scotland and America The literary and intellectual traditions of Scotland, particularly in the modern period, are well known and much honored in North America, not least because of the considerable influence of Scots and Scots-Irish thinkers on the development of political thought and educational practice there. The role of ex-Presbyterian Scots-Irish who had migrated to and out of other denominations is also significant, most especially perhaps Alexander Campbell 1788-1866 who followed his father Thomas to America in 1809 and engaged in a famous eight day debate in 1836 with John B. It treated biblical narrative and religious discourse as forms of moral or spiritual commitment or aspiration.
