Externalism and Internalism in the Philosophy of Mind

At the opposite extreme, the mind necessarily depends on external factors. We make contextual offers to students whose personal circumstances may have restricted achievement at school or college.

Externalism and Self

The points taken from Burge and developed above can be taken to show at least that that thesis is not as well-motivated as Fodor seems to think. In fact, there is no reason why realists cannot agree with anti-realists in regarding the conflict between a punctate geometry and a region-based geometry as merely apparent. One way in which the relationship may be elaborated is as follows.
