Towards Decolonization and Settler Responsibility: Reflections on a Decade of Indigenous Solidarity Organizing

But if a student maps a local route and tracks the time for different legs of a journey using something similar to , they can determine average velocities for each segment of a journey. With another massive wind-park project planned in Sweden, a proposed new arctic rail-line in Finland, and increasingly harsh restrictions on traditional fishing on the Deatnu River, in recent years colonization has found favor amongst settler populations whilst wearing a green mask.

How should universities approach decolonisation?

If you engage in anti-racist work: consider doing the work of understanding settler colonialism as a structure and logic distinct from racial capitalism although interlocking... that is defined in terms of self-determination rather than solely rights. In the Four Directional model, the Spiritual Pillar is the first pillar and should be highlighted. We try to translate why these Games and these revitalizations are important to a largely non-Indigenous audience, who do not have the life experiences to understand the urgency of this work, so that elite institutions, funders, and governing bodies might better understand its value and, in turn, improve strategic investments in decolonizing programs.

Decolonising strategies and neoliberal dilemmas in a tertiary institution: Nurturing care

Hosting the Games at the University of Wisconsin—Madison is valuable because the event is not staged for an audience, but rather created to facilitate learning. For example, traditionally, students might learn about velocity by reading or listening to a lecture , completing worksheets, then answering multiple-choice questions.

Decolonising strategies and neoliberal dilemmas in a tertiary institution: Nurturing care

There is a long history of decolonial work in educational spaces. Snowsnakes and canoes are meant to be preserved as artifacts and pieces of art.

Conscious relaxation is believed to help process information and learning and to facilitate deep integration of knowledge.
