Online health information in South Korean public libraries: Developing evaluation criteria

Complex websites were mostly likely to have a middle ease of use.

However, the percentages for libraries in the Rocky Mountain region and in the Far West region should be regarded with caution because the N for these two regions was very small—fewer than 20 libraries. Indeed, one central library director interviewed during the pre-survey development stage of this evaluation reported that the cost of connectivity in his system was immense, thus creating a real barrier to service delivery to his client population. Section One presents a summary of the areas of use of Library Services and Technology Act Funds in New York and a summary of the positive effects of these areas of use is presented.

A strong consensus was found between the two groups. Three subjective evaluations of website quality were collected in the data analysis: the complexity of the site, ease of use, and accuracy as judged by broken links, empty pages, and other problems. In addition, they saw this as a means of developing further understanding of the scope and achievements of the program.
