Old English House Plans

Henry III built a luxurious royal palace within the castle during the middle of the century, and Edward III went further, rebuilding the palace to produce an even grander set of buildings. Overlooking the River Tame, the site has been fortified since Anglo-Saxon times, when Ethelfleda, the Mercian Queen, built a burh to defend against Danes in 913.

In 1581 Edmund Campion hid in the roof space while he printed 400 copies of his famous treatise, Decem Rationes, arguing for Catholicism. The present castle was constructed by the Norman invaders in the 1080s, occupying the south western part of the earlier burh. It was briefly retaken by the Britons from his son Hussa during the war of 590 before being relieved later the same year.
