Much of the expansion in higher education, as noted previously, has been recorded in the private sector. Still, all programmes are being asked to start internships for students, so we in English try to work with charities, galleries and other cultural organisations where we have connections. The challenge today is to situate the novel or the play, or the poem in a continuum of textual production that takes into account a variety of modern literary forms, including the digital.

The consequences that need to be addressed by education systems include declining school enrolments, delayed enrolments, erratic attendance, poor attention and performance, higher dropout levels, and reversal of Education for All development gains in the sector. Under these circumstances, achieving the Millennium Development Goals seems to be very difficult by 2015. Indeed, we might feel grateful to the students exercised by these matters for raising the question at all.

The state of the discipline: English studies

The fact that they have been dead for centuries means they have something to say, theirs is a life of rawness which is emulated today every day and speaks to us all regardless. Commonalities between texts can be verified by counting the frequency of certain words, and questions of authorship can be settled by coming up with verbal fingerprints, as it were, for individual authors.
