Acquisition of spoken and signed English by profoundly deaf children

The second type of evaluation reports subjective impressions and observations of the EPIC children obtained from teachers, parents, and visitors to the Project.

GAEL

The gap between oral and manual production of the children in total communication programs indicates that spoken English did not develop simultaneously with manually coded English and that these children educated in programs using manually coded English did not develop competence with early developing English syntax at a rate faster than those not using signs. Following implantation, it was possible to determine threshold and comfortable listening levels for each electrode pair.
