AFTER THE HANDBOOK: SIX YEARS OF MEADS V. MEADS		1167
DONALD J. NEWMAN
This article addresses the phenomenon of judicial independence (JPI) through a retrospective investigation of Meads v. Meads. The author begins by discussing the Meads decision in historical and contemporary context, and then presents an analysis of the JPI in the Meads decision. In the next section, the author discusses the Meads decision in the context of the JPI in general, and the public. Then, the author discusses Meads as a unique case of judicial independence and discusses the implications of the Meads decision for the JPI in general. The author concludes by discussing the Meads decision in the context of the JPI in general, and the public.

I. INTRODUCTION
On 19 September 2012, Associate Chief Justice Binnie of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench issued Meads v. Meads, a very unusual and arguably unprecedented, 76 paragraph decision in response to, of all things, an application to review a contentious divorce matter into one management. Case management was, in fact, granted, but more importantly Meads also responded to a collection of methodical documents and arguments advanced by the husband, Dennis Larry Meads. He responded to every one of the case management parties his fiduciary, unfairly imposed a scheme of fines on anyone who would interact with him or use his name, and drafted a contract between himself (DENNIS LARRY MEADS) and himself (Dennis Larry Meads), which said he "Meads" could pay his spousal and child support obligation from his "MEADS" (1000 million dollar public trust) bank account. Needless to say, this was all nonsense.
