His solution, in 1827, was basically sulfur on a stick ignited by friction, the match, 50 for a shilling. He's self-deprecating, very honest, straightforward and polite. Educated at the City of London School, he saw active service in France in 1918 and then read history at Merton College, Oxford, obtaining a first class degree in modern history in 1922, and a DPhil in 1924; his thesis was published in 1925 as The Last Florentine Republic.
