A detailed history of the Scottish Labour History Society written by the former Chair of the Society, and current editorial collective and SLHS committee member, Rob Duncan, can be found below logged-in users only. We would be pleased to accept donations from individuals and affiliates interested in helping the Society to promote labour history through its publications, events and activities. Marcel Van Der Linden, in a magisterial survey, has argued that the origins of labour history can be dated back to the third quarter of the 19th century when the first labour and working-class movements were active internationally.

The Journal

Thompson, and feminist and comparative historians have brought to the subject over the last 50 years. . With the collapse of official communism during the 1980s and defeats for labour movements in much of the world the old certainties of labour history were questioned and post-modernist categories began to have an influence.
