Nowhere is this more true than in the realm of military activity. Yet it has also, though to a much lesser extent, developed an autonomous military space capability.

Today the military forces of many nations, wherever they may be around the globe, rely to an ever increasing extent on the use of space-based assets for a wide range of support facilities, from communication and surveillance to apparently more mundane, but no less important tasks, such as weather forecasting. Over the past few decades Europe has grown to take her current place as the world's third power in terms of civilian space activities.

In the comparatively few years since the first man-made satellite was launched into earth orbit, the world has witnessed a spectacular growth not only in the number of satellites launched, but in the wide range of different purposes which they serve. While it is true to say that the Soviet Union and the United States of America are without any doubt the current leaders in such military uses of space, other nations are also increasingly reliant on such technology.
