New Zealand govt apologizes for 1970s raids against Pacific community

What used to be sincere requests for exoneration has in many cases turned to token displays of regret.

Apologies New Zealand for raids and deportations in 1970s

Many workers were in the country too long. Today's ceremony was originally scheduled for June, but was postponed due to the measures against the coronavirus. Police arrested many Pacific peoples in the 1970s.

In particular, the functions of apologies between friends may be more complex than a simple linear model suggests. But those who migrated faced a backlash during the 1970s downturn, with claims they were taking jobs from New Zealanders. The first was to Chinese immigrants who for many years were asked to pay a specific tax, and the second was to Samoa for mistreatment during New Zealand's colonial administration.

New Zealand apologizes to Pacific communities

Apologies in the history of English: Routinized and lexicalized expressions of responsibility and regret. The government expresses its sorrow, remorse, and regrets that the Dawn Raids and random police checks occurred and that these actions were ever considered appropriate, Ardern said. This also happened with random police checks on the streets, schools or churches.

New Zealand apologizes to Pacific communities

It lives on in the disruption of trust and faith in authorities, and it lives on in the unresolved grievances of Pacific communities.
