Thanks to a booming economy and vast expanses of unpopulated land, the years 1910 to 1913 marked the high-water point with an average of 286,000 migrants arriving annually and 400,870 in 1913 alone.

Ghanaian women in Toronto's labour market: Negotiating gendered roles and transnational household strategies.

However, the limited data available on the recession and migration patterns suggests that the overall numbers of people both emigrating and returning home have stayed the same or fallen.

Before being named VP of Eagle-Horse, Akbari was chief operating officer of Coco Frutti restaurants and was responsible for the sales and operations of all the restaurants including end-to-end management of all the supplier contracts and new developments. Her situation is quite representative of the experiences of the other women, all of whom had obtained resident status at the time of the interviews.
