History of local government in England

The government's stated reason for the abolition of the MCCs, in its 1983 white paper , was based on efficiency and their overspending.

What is local government?

In developing the local delivery pilot approach, we explored the world of whole-systems approaches and systems leadership - here, we're sharing some of the reports and documents we found useful. Generally they were run by a town , made up of council , the town 'elders'.

local government

In this context, the introduced by the , and perhaps lasting 300 years, can be seen as a 'blip', before earlier patterns of administration re-emerged. These county functions were attached to the legal system, since this was the only body which acted county-wide at that time.

In the six , the councils also appoint members to joint county-wide to oversee , and joint waste disposal authorities, which were created after the county councils were abolished. The was abolished for other parts of the country in 1969, but due to the low resident population of the City this was thought impractical. The primary justification for this is that the services provided by the City of London are used by approximately 450,000 workers who dwell outside the City, and only by 7200 residents a ratio not found elsewhere in the UK.
