The 1950s

These weapons are ipso facto engines of indiscriminate mass destruction. The advent of the nation-state had such a profound impact that Knox and Murray identify it as the first of five military revolutions in Western history. The views advanced here are the author's own, and do not reflect those of ARCIC, TRADOC, or the United States Army.

In the contemporary era, the overwhelming lethality of the battlefield is generated by a suite of interlocking technological solutions that has extended battlefield geometries over progressively greater distances as militaries disperse and conceal forces in order to preserve combat power in the face of modern firepower. In times of war, the hierarchy and the power of these concepts is inverted.
