Some Poems of Jules Laforgue with Images by Patrick Caulfield (1973) : Art in Print

Loved that it included the original poem in French so an opportunity to read in French is also had. They pass, they pass, they have the eyes of virgins, Eyes with the blue-tints of sun-dials, You can hear the hour of desire strike for them, The hour kept safe for them, for the Eternal Female, The hour of their immortality. Forward, and tear these roots that glue like night, Through mamma, love of albumen, to the light, To the rich gracious stamen of the bright Rising sun! If only you had wanted to be a little like the others afterward.

The Last Poems of Jules LaForgue

A great poet of symbolism sadly lost too early as he is one of the early members of the 27 Club having died only 4 days after turning 27.

O take care of yourself, I beg you. The overt can be helpful is shedding light where needed.

Two poems by Jules Laforgue by Louis Simpson

As for me, it is the season that wants me to go. Water, yes, for my heart Which is burning so, for my flesh which so obsesses me! Laforgue has been praised by Ezra Pond, T.

This is the anniversary night of the failed good Love, When all the Valkyries of the wind Come back roaring under the crack of my door: Vae sol! Everyone, I believe, who is at all sensible to the seductions of poetry, can remember some moment in youth when he or she was completely carried away by the work of one poet. Yes, this is the real sacred! Very early on I had tremendous help from Linda Orr, Professor Emeritus of Romance Studies at Duke University; her comments made a great difference in my approach to the poems. In 1881 Laforgue wrote a novel, Stephane Vassiliev and prepared a collection of poems entitled The Tears of the Earth, which he later abandoned, though some pieces were altered for Les Complaintes.
