Management strategies for coastal conservation in South Wales, U.K.

When the dam was breached at the time of the Anglian glaciation the sea level was low and the Channel area was dry land but in the subsequent warm period, the Hoxnian interglacial, sea level rose as the ice sheets melted and the first marine connection was established through the Dover Strait. Sedimentological studies also provide valuable information on the palaeoenvironments; sedimentary structures tell about current directions and velocities; evaporites minerals are indications of former brine salinities and reveal information about the climate. The bed containing the most abundant vertebrate fossils probably represents the top Lower Tunbridge Wells pebble bed.
