As any great essayist does, Biss moves outward in concentric circles from her own very private view of the world to reveal wider truths, discovering as she does a culture consumed by anxiety at the pervasive toxicity of contemporary life. Less communal dining—but maybe more cooking .

Together

It might sound idealistic, but there are two reasons to think it can happen.

America has long equated patriotism with the armed forces. In this sequel to his influential work The Craftsman, Richard Sennett explores how we can learn to cooperate in the intensely tribal, competitive, and self-interested cultures we inhabit. Living with people who differ—racially, ethnically, religiously, or economically—is the most urgent challenge facing civil society today.
