The real economic and environmental impact of tourism in Wales

Long-haul travel between developed and developing countries is increasing annually and is bringing them into direct contact with each other. Local and indigenous communities should be included in planning, development and operation. Effects and Conflicts Single land uses occur for many thousands of hectares of land, but, given that land is a finite resource, various organisations are endeavouring to use one area of land for more than one land use.

Overtourism

Tourists contribute to sales, profits, jobs, tax revenues, and income in an area. Jim: So I want to be able to move around a lot, walk, see new sights, and meet new people. Greater extraction and transport of these resources exacerbates the physical impacts associated with their exploitation.

In parallel to the development of this responsible tourism concept, many tourists have become conscientious about negative externalities such as environment degradation and destructive social changes. It is ironic really, that tourism often destroys the very things that it relies on! It has the potential to provide direct and indirect employment for a large assortment of people in various social strata including part time and seasonal job opportunities for many people.

These steps are important, but much needs to be achieved in a structured fashion, since tourism programmes are very interdependent, effectively re-opening the tourism economy and getting companies up and running. In the countries of Central Europe, such as Germany, Switzerland, and Austria, as well as large areas of France, typically about one third of the area is under forest cover and all countries provide free access to the forest. Abstract Tourism is vulnerable to exogenous factors; these factors can disrupt the tourism industry, lead to the decline in tourists, and influence their choice of destination.

The planning of new recreational infrastructure has a long tradition in Central Europe.

Why tourism is so important to Wales

There have traditionally been differences between the different management agencies, the National Park Service being concerned with scenery, nature and recreation management and therefore a more focused remit than the Forest Service or BLM which each have goals to develop and use a wide range of natural resources. The tourism industry, both locally and at the international level, has had the capacity to present a positive image of being beneficial for society. Tourism has the potential to create beneficial effects on the environment by contributing to environmental protection and conservation.
