Men of Letters in the Early Republic: Cultivating Forums of Citizenship by Catherine O'Donnell Kaplan (Paperback, 2008) for sale online

In the aftermath of the Revolutionary War, after decades of intense upheaval and debate, the role of the citizen was seen as largely political.

Men of Letters in the Early Republic

. He had earlier in the day penned a rough accounting of his expenditures for the previous year, but he returned to his diary that evening because he thought it was important to write a detailed account of his visit to the home of a friend, Horace Johnson. Another highlight is its demonstration of how masculine sentiment became somewhat of a Federalist possession in a political era dominated by Jeffersonian politics.

Political responsibilities seemed to subsume all other duties, political speech to drown out all other communication, and the American identity as citizen to supersede all other identities. Through these groups, Kaplan demonstrates, an enduring and influential model of the man of letters emerged in the first decade of the nineteenth century.

Kaplan looks at three groups in particular: the Friendly Club in New York City, which revolved around Elihu Hubbard Smith, with collaborators such as William Dunlap and Charles Brockden Brown; the circle around Joseph Dennie, editor of two highly successful periodicals; and the Anthologists of the Boston Athenaeum . The best historical monograph on Shaftesburian literary communities in the post-Revolutionary period.
