At the heart of social partnership, IBEC argue, consistent with the need to maintain a competitive economy, is the need for a more balanced approach to social measures, particularly in line with stated commitments on labour market flexibility in the context of the Lisbon Process. Co-operating with it were such people as Francis Sheehy-Skeffington, who was a pacifist-socialist, but the SPI was not pacifist but anti-militarist. Even when no longer illegal, trade unions operated in an economic and political climate so hostile that for most of the century they left few formal records of their own.

A Brief History

This illuminated the complex role of women in the changing Irish society and economy and the positive and negative influences that shape their behaviour as consumers. .
